Unsung Heroes

By James D. Crabtree

In 1860 the telegraph was a relatively new gadget. People today have many options for getting in touch with someone else, from live video to IMs to cellphones, but in 1860 there was only the telegraph. While considered primitive by today's technological standards the telegraph was a miracle to people who could only reach someone else by mail or by courier or by contacting them in person. The idea that someone on the other end of a wire, maybe hundreds of miles away, was relaying information by means of a bunch of clicks seemed like something Merlin might have dreamed up. But when the Civil War broke out the telegraph became one of the means of prosecuting war, even a "combat multiplier" as it allowed coordinated military operations over enormous distances.

What few people realize today is how young many of the operators were at the ends of those wires. Just as young people today grow up with the computer and digital technology in the 1860s young people grew up learning about the mysteries of the telegraph, how to do morse code and the primitive batteries which powered the keys. Brass Pounders looks specifically at the stories of several of the young Union operators during the war, few of whom were over 20 when it ended and most of whom were mere teenagers. They had the burden of responsibility of passing messages back and forth between the different fronts, of making sure generals had access to the wires soon after establishing headquarters and of working with no sleep under the most primitive conditions. Not a thick book, Brass Pounders is nevertheless very engaging and well worth getting if you are a student of the Civil War.
